THE ANTI-FOOTBALL SENTIMENT

The movement against college football, as it is played at present, is steadily gaining ground. It is now reasonably certain that by next season amendments that will eliminate most of the brutality will be made in the rules. Francis S. Bangs, chairman of the committee on athletics of Columbia university, went on record in yesterday's papers as saying that college football is "a brutal and abominable" game. He is strongly in favor of revising the rules.

So is President Butler of Columbia and so are the heads of other prominent institutions of learning. It is said by some that the athletic associations of the universities cannot be trusted to revise the rules. Well, it looks now as though they will either be compelled to revise the rules, eliminating all brutality, or give up football entirely. There is no doubt that the heads of colleges who are in favor of revising can compel it.

They can say to their athletic associations that if the rules are not revised the game of football will not be permitted. And that is the proper stand to take. The list of football casualties this year, with many games still scheduled to be played, has been so large that authorities outside of the universities have been looking into the matter. A Chicago alderman introduced the other night in the council a resolution directing the corporation counsel to draw an ordinance designed to prevent football games in that city until after the rules have been amended.

The resolution recites that numerous casualties on the football field have been reported, that the game is brutal and unnecessarily rough and that the lives of the players are jeopardized. The resolution was referred to the committee on public health. It will probably be passed at the next meeting of the council and the ordinance may be adopted. This shows the gain in the anti-football sentiment.

The people of the United States, like many athletics; they like to see young men engaged in contests of skill and strength. But they do not want to see any longer contests in which there is grave danger of death or serious injury to the participants. The football rules must be amended or the game must go.
